

Q & A

to Understand Victims

Q What is the difference between a marital quarrel and domestic violence?

A Domestic violence is not simply a marital quarrel. It is an infringement of human rights in which one side tries to control the other by using violence or threats. Although an abuser may try to use the excuse that it is only a marital quarrel, violence and threats are not forgivable under any circumstances.

Q Why don't you escape?

A Victims of DV are deeply wounded physically and emotionally from the physical and mental violence of the abuser. After much repeated violence, victims may lack the strength to resist domestic violence. If the abuser repeatedly says, "It's your fault..." the victim may come to think, "It's because I have my faults" and may develop the habit of self-blaming, which makes it difficult to decide to escape from the abuse. In addition, a victim may decide to return to the abuser due to concerns about life after escaping, thinking that things will work out as long as they can bear with the situation.

Q What influence does DV have on children?

(Quotes from the Cabinet Office's Gender Equality Bureau website)

A In families where DV occurs, violence against children may also be taking place.

When a child is exposed to DV, it is considered to be emotional abuse.

DV disrupts the fundamental safety and peace of mind that are essential for a child's growth. DV is also reported to have various adverse effects on the child both physically and mentally.

DV

What Is Domestic Violence?

Domestic violence (DV) is the violent abuse inflicted on you by someone close to you, such as your spouse or intimate partner, or someone with whom you had this type of relationship. DV includes not only physical abuse, such as hitting and kicking, but also abusive behavior such as shouting, neglect, and restricting activities with friends and acquaintances.

Types of DV

Physical Abuse

Behavior such as hitting, kicking, pulling hair, strangling, and throwing things.

Mental Abuse

Behavior such as shouting, neglect, belittling the victim in front of people, or breaking things that are of value to the victim.

Sexual Abuse

Behavior such as forcing the victim to view pornographic videos or magazines they do not want to see, forcing sexual activities, or not supporting the use of birth control.

Financial Abuse

Behavior such as providing the victim with inadequate financial support for everyday living or preventing the victim from working.

Digital Abuse

Behavior such as slandering the victim on the Internet or monitoring the victim by mobile phone.

Note: DV is not restricted to heterosexual couples, but also applies to same-sex couples as well.

If a Victim Consults You about DV

It takes courage for a victim to ask someone for advice. If someone consults you, listen to them carefully and reassure them by saying, "It's not your fault." And please advise them to contact a specialized consultation center for help.
